Life in Prehistoric Florida

‘Life in Prehistoric Florida’ will describe the day-to-day struggle for survival of Florida’s Native Americans—how they used flora and fauna for subsistence and medicinal purposes, their food-gathering techniques, and the methods of protection these indigenous tribes used in their confrontation with a hostile environment.

This session will focus on the Ais Indians that occupied the Florida coastline throughout the length of Brevard County. This large tribe of hunter/gatherers lived a semi-nomadic existence, setting up villages near plentiful food sources and moving when food became scarce.

Large ‘middens’ of discarded shellfish, tools and weapons were left behind as the villages relocated to new areas. Gregg has excavated many of these middens in Brevard and will bring artifacts found during those digs.

An invaluable source of information on the Ais is found in the recorded memories of Quaker Jonathon Dickinson, a survivor of a 1696 shipwreck on the Florida east coast. We present a summary of some of the “Dickenson’s experience” on page 3. You can purchase an edition of “Jonathon Dickenson’s Journal” at the bookstore of the Florida Historical Society in Cocoa Beach.

Dear Members and Friends...

During my term as president, I've been touting our goal as a "reorganization" of the SBHS. However, due to this wonderful break through of spring like weather and in honor of "spring housecleaning" (perhaps an historic concept in itself) I offer you a revised goal: REINVENTION.

Reinvention has a much fresher and creative sound. Things have changed so much since the founding of the Society in 1966. We have more historical resources in our community and communication has drastically changed.

Our mission hasn't changed but the ways we can accomplish it have. In coming editions, I'll pose questions and expect that you'll respond with answers and ideas. Stay tuned!

Jonathan Dickinson meets the Ais Indians

(a brief summary of the account)

On August 23, 1696 a fleet of 13 ships left Port Royal, Jamaica for the American colonies. Among the ships was the 'Reformation' owned by Englishman Jonathan Dickinson a wealthy merchant from Port Royal. The Reformation carried 24 passengers including Dickinson's wife and infant son.

During a storm the Reformation was shipwrecked on the east Florida coast near Hobe Sound. Soon the local Indian tribe, the 'Jaegas' discovered the wreck, captured the passengers and plundered the ship. The Jaegas freed the captives on Sept. 28 allowing them to take a small boat and meager supplies.

The castaways set out to reach St. Augustine. The small boat held the injured and weak with men to row while the rest of the party walked along the beach. On Sept. 30 they entered Ais Indian territory. The Ais lived in villages along the shores of the 'Rio de Ais' now known as the Indian River. The Ais had befriended the Spanish but were hostile to the English. The Dickinson party spent a month with the Ais trying to convince them that all of the castaways were Spanish.

Dickinson gave brief descriptions of the Ais in his journal. For clothing, the men wore a woven triangle of palm fronds secured around the waist with a palm frond belt secured in the back with native grass that resembled a horse tail. The women wore, if anything, deer skins or grass skirts. The Ais did not farm and gathered what edible plants were available. They caught fish and served it boiled. The fish was gutted but the head and scales remained. The fish was gutted but the head and scales remained. The fish was served on palmetto fronds. Clams were also roasted and offered to the Dickinson group.
